

Raphael Gielgen

Raphael Gielgen researches the future of work and working environments. His workplace is the world. To do this, he travels around the globe like few other people. Always with the question of what the nature of changed knowledge work will look like in five or ten years' time. Every year, he visits more than 100 companies, start-ups, universities and research institutions in the USA, Europe and Asia. He documents the findings and experiences from his travels on a "panorama", a map of trends and patterns from around the world. What drives him is his curiosity for architecture, technology and social...

Topics

Future Advisory Board, New Work & New Culture, Transformation, Innovation & Technology, Trends, Future & Science

Languages

English, German

